Cretum Growth, Value & Volatility Fund

The flexibility of investing globally

Fund Overview

Cretum Capital is an asset management firm specializing in a Macro-Multi-Strategy approach with a focus on North America. Our primary objective is to achieve superior risk-adjusted returns by integrating Macroeconomic analysis, fundamental company analysis, and assessing political and economic factors. Cretum Capital is committed to long-term outperformance while maintaining a focus on capital preservation under all circumstances. Our strategy involves deploying diverse market positions, including long/short positions in equities, indices, currencies, interest rate spreads, and dividend strategies. We aim to diversify risk through covariance analysis, seeking low correlations between asset classes, especially during periods of stress and heightened volatility.

Market Commentary

May was another strong month for global risk assets, supported mainly by solid earnings, AI optimism, and improving expectations around the Middle East conflict. In the United States, the S&P 500 gained 5.26%, while the Nasdaq rose 8.25%, with both main indexes closing the month near record highs. The strongest support came from technology and AI-related companies, where earnings and forward guidance continued to validate the market's willingness to pay high multiples for growth. Dell's strong outlook, together with gains in Microsoft, Hewlett Packard Enterprise, Super Micro Computer and other technology names, helped reinforce the idea that AI-related demand remains one of the most important drivers of equity performance.

Early in the month, the S&P 500 and Nasdaq reached record closes after signs of a possible resolution in the Middle East conflict, while AMD rose sharply after forecasting better-than-expected revenue driven by strong demand for data-center chips. Later in the month, stocks again reached record highs as investors reacted positively to a potential extension of the U.S.-Iran ceasefire and to a decline in oil prices.

However, the month was not free of risks. Inflation remained a relevant concern, especially because higher energy prices continued to affect expectations for the Federal Reserve. U.S. consumer inflation for April showed renewed pressure, with core CPI rising 2.8% year-over-year after 2.6% in March, while estimates for core PCE remained elevated. Treasury yields also moved higher during part of the month, with the 10-year yield reaching its highest level since May 2025 as investors repriced the possibility that inflation could remain sticky for longer.

Europe also performed well in May, but the region's recovery looked more dependent on external conditions than the U.S. rally. The STOXX 600 gained 2.5% during the month and remained near record highs. Even so, the European market remained exposed to the same source of risk that had dominated previous months: higher energy prices and the possibility that inflation could force the European Central Bank to tighten policy again.

In Mexico, May was a more constructive month than April, although the improvement was moderate. The S&P/BMV IPC rose from 67,858.09 points at the end of April to 68,587.74 points at the end of May, equivalent to a gain of approximately 1.07%. This means Mexican equities participated in the global risk-on tone, but with much less strength than U.S. technology-led markets. The local market continued to face a difficult economic environment, especially after INEGI reported that Mexico's economy contracted 0.6% quarter-over-quarter in the first quarter, even though the result was slightly better than the 0.8% decline expected by economists.

The most important domestic event in Mexico was Banxico's monetary-policy decision. On May 7, Banco de México cut its benchmark rate by 25 basis points to 6.50%, its lowest level since 2022, but the decision was split and the central bank signaled that the easing cycle was coming to an end. This was important because Mexican assets still benefit from attractive carry, but the combination of weak growth, inflation above target, and less room for additional rate cuts made the outlook more delicate.

In Asia, China showed a more mixed story. Chinese equities continued to benefit from liquidity, optimism around technology, and selective strength in semiconductors and AI-related sectors, but macroeconomic data showed that the recovery was losing some momentum. China's official manufacturing PMI fell to 50.0 in May from 50.3 in April, signaling stagnation, while new export orders contracted. The private manufacturing PMI was better, at 51.8, but it also slowed from April's 52.2. This suggests that China's economy was still expanding in some areas, but external demand and cost pressures were beginning to weigh on manufacturing confidence.

Foreign exchange reflected the different regional stories. Against the euro, the U.S. dollar remained relatively range-bound during the month, with EUR/USD showing a one-month decline of around 0.62% as of May 29. The euro was supported by expectations that the ECB may need to raise rates again because of above-target inflation, but it was also limited by Europe's weaker growth outlook and vulnerability to energy prices. Against the Mexican peso, the dollar remained relatively stable. The peso continued to benefit from Mexico's high interest-rate differential and the global risk-on environment, but weak domestic growth and Banxico's rate cut limited the possibility of a stronger rally. As a result, USD/MXN stayed contained, although the peso's future strength will depend on the path of U.S. rates and oil-related inflation pressures.

Overall, May 2026 was a strong month for global equities, led by U.S. technology and AI-related earnings, while optimism around a potential Middle East resolution also supported risk appetite. However, the recovery was not uniform: Europe remained exposed to energy-driven inflation, Mexico faced weak growth and a more cautious Banxico, and China's equity strength contrasted with softer manufacturing data.

In this environment, at Cretum, we recognize that market momentum remains positive, but the risks behind that momentum have not disappeared. The technology sector, in particular, could experience a pullback if investors begin to see any signs of deceleration in earnings, AI-related demand, or infrastructure spending. On the other hand, we are close the SpaceX's IPO, which could become the largest public offering in U.S. history so far. This reinforces the fact that the market remains willing to pay high multiples for exceptional technology companies with strong growth narratives. We believe that as long as the massive investment in AI infrastructure continues to translate into real revenue growth, markets may continue to move higher. However, the speed and magnitude of the rally seem difficult to sustain, at least in the short term.

Performance overview

During May, our algorithmic strategies outperformed the market benchmark. Most of the stocks across these three strategies delivered double-digit month-to-date returns. Altogether, the strategies added +1.36% to the fund's monthly return.

Secondly, some of our private equity positions experienced a modest but consistent upside revaluation, contributing +0.66% to the fund's monthly performance. We expect that during the second half of the year, nearly all of our positions could undergo a significantly stronger revaluation.

Additionally, our UK equity holdings continued to deliver strong results, adding +0.34% to the monthly performance. Finally, as we aim to do each month, we collected premiums through our derivatives strategies, and May was no exception, this contributed an additional +0.24% to the fund's return.

Given the current market levels and the rally observed since the ceasefire was announced, we decided to increase our cash position to 19%, with a minimum target of 20%. We believe this strong rally carries more downside risk than further upside potential, so disciplined allocation will be critical to protecting the returns achieved so far.

Our challenges

Our Asian equity holdings experienced a modest pullback during the month, in line with the broader Asian market landscape. This resulted in a -0.04% impact on the fund's monthly return.

Additionally, our volatility position ended the month in negative territory as markets reached new all-time highs. However, the impact was also modest, accounting for just -0.03% of the monthly performance.

This month, we were unable to outperform the S&P 500, primarily due to the broad diversification of our U.S. equity holdings. Although we ended the month in positive territory, the reality is that most of the rally in U.S. markets was driven by semiconductors and technology, while nearly all other sectors failed to participate. As a result, given our diversification across multiple sectors, several of our non-semiconductor holdings delivered flat performance, leaving us trailing the index. Nevertheless, we remain confident in our management approach and our diversification, which should provide meaningful defensiveness in the event of a sharp market pullback, a scenario we consider reasonably probable.

Fund Risk Disclosures: Hedge funds are unregistered private investment pools that may invest and trade in various markets, strategies, and instruments (including securities, non-securities, and derivatives) and are not subject to the same regulatory requirements as mutual funds, including mutual fund requirements to provide certain periodic and standardized pricing and valuation information to investors. There are substantial risks in investing in hedge funds. You should carefully consider the following: Hedge funds represent speculative investments and involve a high degree of risk. An investor could lose all or a substantial part of their investment. Investors must have the financial ability, sophistication/experience, and willingness to bear the risks of an investment in a hedge fund. An investment in a hedge fund should be discretionary capital reserved strictly for speculative purposes. An investment in a hedge fund is not suitable or advisable for all investors. Only eligible qualified investors may invest in hedge funds. Hedge fund offering documents are not reviewed or approved by federal or state regulators. Hedge funds may be leveraged (including a high degree of leverage), and hedge fund performance can be volatile. An investment in a hedge fund may not be liquid, and there may be significant restrictions on the transfer of interests in a hedge fund. There is no secondary market for a hedge fund investment, nor is one expected to develop. A hedge fund may use a single advisor or employ a single strategy, which could result in a lack of diversification and higher risk. A hedge fund may involve complex tax structures, which should be read carefully, and may involve structures or strategies that may cause delays in important tax information being sent to investors. Hedge fund fees and expenses, which may be substantial, will offset the hedge fund's trading profits, regardless of any positive returns. Hedge funds are not required to provide periodic pricing or valuation information to investors. Hedge funds and their managers/advisors may be subject to various conflicts of interest. The foregoing summary is not a complete list of the risks and other important disclosures involved in investing in hedge funds and is subject to more complete disclosures contained in a hedge fund's confidential offering documents, which must be reviewed carefully.
