Market Commentary

April was a month in which global markets moved from stress to recovery, but without fully eliminating the risks that had dominated the previous months. The main difference was that investors became more willing to look through the geopolitical and energy shock as corporate earnings, stronger U.S. economic data, and hopes of a more contained Middle East conflict helped restore risk appetite.

In the United States, April was clearly a risk-on month. The S&P 500 rose more than 10% during the month, while the Nasdaq gained more than 15%, making it the strongest monthly performance for both indexes since 2020. The rally was supported by stronger-than-expected corporate earnings, particularly in technology and AI-related names, and by investors' willingness to look past the oil shock that had pressured markets in March.

The main trigger behind the U.S. rebound was earnings. To mention some of them, Alphabet rose after strong results, Caterpillar reached a record high after better profits, and Eli Lilly gained after raising its forecast, helping the market regain confidence that corporate fundamentals remained solid despite a more difficult macro environment. At the same time, the Federal Reserve kept rates unchanged at the end of the month, but the decision was unusually divided, showing that policymakers were still facing a difficult balance between inflation risk and the need to preserve growth. This combination allowed equities to rally, but it also reminded investors that the policy backdrop was not fully comfortable.

Europe also had a strong recovery in April, although the region's rebound looked more fragile than the one in the United States. The STOXX 600 gained 4.8% in April, its best monthly performance since January 2025, helped by corporate earnings and optimism that the conflict in the Middle East could become more contained. However, the index still remained below its pre-war levels, which shows that investors were not fully convinced that the region had escaped the energy shock.

In Mexico, April was more mixed. The S&P/BMV IPC ended the month at 67,858.09 points, slightly below the level reported at the end of March, which means Mexican equities did not participate in the global rebound with the same strength as U.S. or European markets. The local market faced a more difficult domestic backdrop, as Mexico's economy contracted 0.8% quarter-over-quarter in the first quarter, worse than expected, while annual growth was almost flat. This created a less supportive environment for equities, especially because the weakness was broad across sectors.

The other important issue in Mexico was inflation. Annual inflation stood at 4.53% in the first half of April, above expectations and still above Banxico's 3% target, even though it slowed from March. Banxico Governor Victoria Rodríguez said inflation was close to resuming its decline toward target, but also acknowledged that the central bank was nearing the end of its rate-cutting cycle. This matters because Mexican assets still benefit from attractive carry, but the combination of weak growth, inflation above target, and less room for aggressive easing made the investment case more delicate.

In Asia, China was one of the more constructive stories of the month. Chinese equities performed strongly, with the CSI 300 showing a 7.02% one-month gain as of April 30. This performance was supported by better economic data and the perception that China was handling the oil shock better than many other import-dependent economies. The official manufacturing PMI remained in expansion territory at 50.3 in April, while the private manufacturing PMI rose to 52.2, the strongest expansion since late 2020.

Foreign exchange reflected the different regional stories. The dollar lost some of the safe-haven support it had gained during March as risk appetite improved, while the euro stabilized around the $1.17 area despite Europe's weaker growth outlook. The euro benefited from the fact that markets began to price a more hawkish ECB path after inflation moved back to 3.0%, even though the region remained vulnerable to energy costs. Against the Mexican peso, the dollar's story was more nuanced. The peso remained supported by Mexico's still-high interest-rate differential, but it struggled to extend gains decisively because investors were also weighing weak domestic growth, inflation above target, and uncertainty around how much more Banxico could cut.

Overall, April 2026 was a month of recovery, but not a month of complete normalization. At Cretum, we believe the Middle East conflict may be approaching a potential resolution; however, there is still not enough clarity to conclude that the situation has been fully resolved, which means volatility could remain persistent throughout May and June. It is also unusual to see rallies of more than 10% in the main U.S. indexes in a single month, and history often suggests that such sharp moves are followed by some degree of adjustment. On the other hand, corporate fundamentals continue to exceed analysts' expectations, which still provides valid reasons to remain invested. In this environment, we believe assets should be managed cautiously, but without abandoning market exposure. Accordingly, we are implementing strategies designed to maintain participation in the market while protecting part of the gains generated during an atypically strong month such as April.

Performance Overview

Since our second-largest allocation is USA Shares, the fund benefited meaningfully from the strong rally observed in April. This strategy was able to add +3.01% to the fund's monthly return, supported by the recovery in U.S. equities and the rebound in several of our core positions.

Secondly, we decided to increase our exposure to our algorithmic models, which we had previously booked and reported as "Russell Strategy, S&P Strategy, and ADR Strategy". These strategies are based on stock-picking models that typically hold between 10 and 15 names each, allowing us to maintain diversified and systematic exposure to selected opportunities. Together, these strategies contributed +2.32% to the fund's monthly return.

We also recently invested in specific U.K. shares that we had studied carefully. These positions performed exceptionally well during the month and added +1.68% to the fund's monthly result.

In addition, we took advantage of the volatility seen throughout April by executing several options strategies. Most of these positions generated consistent positive results, mainly through premium collection and disciplined risk management. Overall, the premiums collected through these strategies added +0.41% to the fund's monthly return.

We also decided to increase our cash level to above 15%, as we view April's rally as atypical and believe some market adjustments could occur in the following months. In this context, holding cash remains an important part of our strategy, as it gives us flexibility to add exposure to companies and investment themes we know well, especially if better entry points become available.

Finally, we are pleased to announce that, during April, we completed the full transfer of the fund's assets to our new vehicle, Cretum Partners GVV Fund, LP. As you may know, this decision was based on three main pillars:

- Superior tax transparency: The new Canadian structure has no separate legal personality and operates as a flow-through entity, which provides full tax transparency for our partners.
- World-class advisory support from Deloitte: As an additional benefit, we will have the tax advisory support of Deloitte, who will provide individual assistance to guide each of our partners on tax matters related to the fund, at no additional cost.
- A path toward securitization through an ETN: This migration is a necessary step toward the potential issuance, in the short to medium term, of an ETN (Exchange Traded Note). This would allow investors who wish to do so to custody their GVV Fund securities directly with international brokers, improving operational flexibility and providing greater visibility over their investment.

We believe this transition represents an important milestone for the fund, strengthening its institutional framework while creating a more efficient, transparent, and scalable structure for our partners going forward.

Our challenges

As we mentioned in the market commentary, Mexican equities did not participate in the strong rally observed in the United States. As a result, our Mexican Shares strategy showed a lagged performance during the month. The decline was not drastic, but rather a broad and consistent adjustment across most of our local positions, reflecting a more cautious environment for Mexican assets. Overall, this strategy detracted -0.35% from the fund's monthly performance.

Our Volatility Strategy also underperformed slightly during the month, as this position is mainly designed to hedge the fund in the event of sharp market adjustments. Given the strong recovery in risk assets during April, the strategy naturally faced some pressure. However, we were able to collect option premiums that helped offset most of the impact, limiting the monthly contribution to only -0.03%.

Fund Risk Disclosures: Hedge funds are unregistered private investment pools that may invest and trade in various markets, strategies, and instruments (including securities, non-securities, and derivatives) and are not subject to the same regulatory requirements as mutual funds, including mutual fund requirements to provide certain periodic and standardized pricing and valuation information to investors. There are substantial risks in investing in hedge funds. You should carefully consider the following: Hedge funds represent speculative investments and involve a high degree of risk. An investor could lose all or a substantial part of their investment. Investors must have the financial ability, sophistication/experience, and willingness to bear the risks of an investment in a hedge fund. An investment in a hedge fund should be discretionary capital reserved strictly for speculative purposes. An investment in a hedge fund is not suitable or advisable for all investors. Only eligible qualified investors may invest in hedge funds. Hedge fund offering documents are not reviewed or approved by federal or state regulators. Hedge funds may be leveraged (including a high degree of leverage), and hedge fund performance can be volatile. An investment in a hedge fund may not be liquid, and there may be significant restrictions on the transfer of interests in a hedge fund. There is no secondary market for a hedge fund investment, nor is one expected to develop. A hedge fund may use a single advisor or employ a single strategy, which could result in a lack of diversification and higher risk. A hedge fund may involve complex tax structures, which should be read carefully, and may involve structures or strategies that may cause delays in important tax information being sent to investors. Hedge fund fees and expenses, which may be substantial, will offset the hedge fund's trading profits, regardless of any positive returns. Hedge funds are not required to provide periodic pricing or valuation information to investors. Hedge funds and their managers/advisors may be subject to various conflicts of interest. The foregoing summary is not a complete list of the risks and other important disclosures involved in investing in hedge funds and is subject to more complete disclosures contained in a hedge fund's confidential offering documents, which must be reviewed carefully.
